This volume presents the evolutionary path of Corporate Social Disclosure (CSD), or sustainability disclosure, which is the set of tools and information that companies have to produce in order to be accountable to their stakeholders. Particular emphasis is given to the Integrated Reporting (IR), the most recent proposal about CSD, with the aim to identify key practical implications for companies and present performance measurement and control frameworks. The issues discussed in the book are of interest for both academics and practitioners, involved in researching, designing and managing sustainability performance measurement and communication systems.

In this book, editors Songini and Pistoni present readers with a collection of academic essays and articles focused on the developing trend of sustainability disclosures by companies. The contributions critically examine the issues, tools, frameworks, and methodologies of sustainability disclosure. Individual selections are focused on the determinants and impacts of sustainability disclosure, new trends and directions in integrated reporting, and a variety of other related subjects.
